OCs OTC Young People subcommittee page

We are happy to announce a new page for the Young People subcommittee! The webpage contains data and resources about young people and contraception, and includes information on the sexual and reproductive rights of young people, contraceptive use among young people in the United States, and evidence supporting an over-the-counter birth control pill for people of all ages. The webpage also describes the subcommittee's current projects and activities and provides a list of media coverage on young people and over-the-counter birth control pills. You can find a link to this new resource on the subcommittee page of the OCs OTC Working Group website.

Media highlights

The need to make OCs available OTC was recently featured in the New Yorker (The threat to birth-control access in the Trump era). In addition to highlighting the pill's economic advantages, safety, and the fact that the US is behind other countries in providing OCs with a prescription, they also highlight research from Katrina Kimport of working group partner, ANSIRH:

In a study she published this past spring, Kimport wrote that the doctors mainly expected the women in a heterosexual relationship to assume the "time, attention, and stress that preventing pregnancy requires," as opposed to their male partners' having their own contraceptive counselling or exploring birth-control options. Doctors viewed obtaining prescriptions, following a regimen, and watching out for side effects as the women's expected duties—and theirs alone. The emotional and mental responsibilities that fall on women, Kimport adds, further the gender inequality that created the initial imbalance. If access to contraception becomes more difficult, women will assume the greater burden.

A writer from a conservative organization made an economic argument for OCs OTC in Newsday (Yes, birth control pills should be available over the counter).

Notably, Safeways across Colorado trained their pharmacists to prescribe OCs and the patch (Birth control available at Colorado pharmacies without visiting a doctor) while Tennessee is still trying to navigate the landscape to make pharmacist prescribing accessible and available (Why women still must see a doctor for the pill, a year after Tennessee law changed).

About us

The Oral Contraceptives (OCs) Over-the-Counter (OTC) Working Group is a coalition of reproductive health, rights, and justice organizations, nonprofit research and advocacy groups, university-based researchers, and prominent clinicians who share a commitment to providing all women of reproductive age easier access to safe, effective, acceptable, and affordable contraceptives. The working group was established in 2004 to explore the potential of over-the-counter access to oral contraceptives to reduce disparities in reproductive health care access and outcomes, and to increase opportunities for women to access a safe, effective method of contraception, free of unnecessary control, as part of a healthy sexual and reproductive life.

The working group is coordinated by Ibis Reproductive Health.
